Cougar Trapping Practices Create Dangers

COMMUNITY NEWS

Animal Protection of New Mexico reports since the New Mexico State Game Commission unanimously approved the New Mexico Department of Game and Fish's (NMDGF) proposed Cougar Rule to allow widespread recreational cougar trapping for the first time in nearly five decades, individuals can now legally litter the state with cougar traps and snares.

The practice of wildlife trapping and snaring has caused enormous controversy and concern across the state.

In an August 2015 statewide poll, New Mexicans opposed the Cougar Rule and the practice of trapping and snaring on public lands by a three-to-one margin.

Traps and snares are indiscriminate, routinely capturing non-target animals such as dogs and endangered species of similar size sharing the same habitat.

The new policy permits trapping and snaring on approximately 9 million acres that spread across nearly every county in New Mexico and includes habitat of endangered Mexican wolves and jaguars and relaxes permit requirements that previously provided a check on setting traps and snares on privately owned land.

Animal Protection of New Mexico, The Humane Society of the United States, and concerned New Mexico citizens are challenging the policy in state and federal court.

Citizens involved in the litigation include longtime wolf enthusiasts and advocates, rescuers who run
